The earliest recorded accounts of the House date back to the Middle Ages, when it was said to have appeared in various locations throughout Europe. It was often associated with strange occurrences, such as inexplicable disappearances and unexplained noises.

Physical Characteristics

The House that Walked Between Worlds is described as a large, rambling structure made of dark, weather-beaten wood. Its windows are said to glow with an ethereal light, and its doors are always locked from the inside.

Despite the House's legendary status, there have been few confirmed sightings in recent times. However, some believe that it continues to exist, hidden from view, waiting for those who dare to unlock its secrets.

In 1972, a group of hikers in the remote mountains of California stumbled upon a house that seemed to fit the legend's description. As they approached, it vanished before their eyes, leaving behind no trace.

A decade later, a similar incident occurred in the Scottish Highlands. Witnesses reported seeing a large wooden house appear and disappear in the mist, leaving an eerie silence in its wake.
